INFORMATION ABOUT WILDE LAKE

Wilde Lake, Columbia's first Village, was incorporated in 1967. Slayton House, the first community center, was opened the same year. The village associations were designed by Columbia's founders to be a focal point for coordination of resident interests and concerns, especially in the areas of advocacy, information and referral, architectural control, and programs for the community.

Every April, elections are held for Village Board of Directors who represent village residents on civic issues and set policy for use of the community center. A village representative to the Columbia Council is also elected at that time. The Wilde Lake Council Representative serves on the Columbia Association Board of Directors. Every adult who owns and/or resides on property in the Village of Wilde Lake is a member of the community association and is eligible to run for office and to vote on behalf of his/her household.

Slayton House is managed by the Wilde Lake Community Association and is used primarily for community meetings, theatre, dance and concert productions, classes for children and adults, and social events. The Bernice Kish Gallery at Slayton House and the Wilde Lake Community Association offices are located here.
